Content check

✔ Text length

! Text to code ratio

6% (Recommended: more than 10%)

The text-to-code ratio describes the relationship between text content and the underlying source code of a website. Each website consists of source code which initially structures the contents of the website in the background as well as the text that is readable by the users.

Google doesn't use the text to HTML ratio as a ranking signal, but it may be seen as a sign that a webpage has bloated HTML, which when served to users, especially on mobile, will cause "slow everything down". Low amount of unique content in relation to HTML code on the page also may be an indication that the page provides information of little value to the reader.
